

David Siegel, Assistant Professor of Political Science at Florida State University, spoke on "Repression, Social Networks, and Collective Action" on April 29, 2008, at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies.

David Siegel studies the manner in which institutions mediate the interactions of people with different motivations, and the ways in which social networks, the media, and electoral institutions present information and alter the nature of collective action.

Richard Herrmann (right), Director of the Mershon Center for International Security Studies, talks with David Siegel after his presentation on April 29, 2008.